GPS Spoofing, Sanctions and The Law

Your GPS says you're here. Are you sure?

Somewhere on the water tonight, a vessel is transmitting a position that doesn't exist and every system tracking it believes the lie completely. GPS spoofing has moved from rare curiosity to routine reality, serious enough that international maritime and aviation authorities have jointly warned of a growing threat to global shipping. For sanctions evasion. For cargo fraud. For collision claims where the tracking data itself can't be trusted. If you work in shipping, this isn't background noise anymore.

Ninety minutes. One room. The evidence, live.
